3	The problem I have is with inputting PDU credits in and determining categories. If the category is not listed, it becomes difficult. I wish there was a way to have someone from PMI interactively walk you through that process. It's a bit cumbersome and I have not been able to add my PDU credits.	Nov 1, 2011 12:26 PM

1	Location is good. I like the venue, I just now work downtown DC instead of Beltsville when I joined. So it is sometimes challenging due to traffic.	Nov 2, 2011 10:56 AM

4	Conflicts with studying	Nov 1, 2011 3:08 PM
5	I'm not as interested in project management as many members--I've done it too long. The networking opportunities seem somewhat limited since most members are not able to do joint ventures or sub or otherwise make business decisions--they're employees working on a specific project with no marketing interests or responsibilities. Nice people but I generally don't learn much, I only have limited experience that I can pass along since so much of PM is not directly teachable, and there are no business reasons for attending. The food is OK, and I go to speakers whose topics appear interesting, but overall it's not something I look forward to. Sorry--all the volunteers are doing a great job IMO!	Nov 1, 2011 1:31 PM
6	No other reasons	Nov 1, 2011 12:44 PM
7	Travel since I am located in NJ and travel to MD for work	Nov 1, 2011 12:35 PM
8	If I need to attend a PMI dinner, I would prefer to do it with SS chapter. I like the people, the speakers, the venue. However, I sit all day and try to get some exercise at night. I have found I can get PDUs from taking a full day or 2 course and doing webinars. This way I can exercise at night and still keep current with my certification. Therefore, I have not been attending meetings.	Nov 1, 2011 12:11 PM

1	Interactive peer discussions, based around deep expertise in a target area are ideal. Rarely does a one hour lecture do more than graze the surface or provide greater insights than the same time surfing can provide. It's interaction and brainstorming, or discussion so not the application of complex practices in real world scenarios that has value. As PMPs, we know the theory, and we know the basics, it needs to be deep, practical and applicable to our professional world to be relevant.	Oct 6, 2011 9:16 PM

8	I think all the volunteers are doing a great job keeping things going, and I appreciate that. Personally I'm just not that interested in the whole topic after 40 years of managing projects--not even completely sure why I got the PMP, but I had a little time around Christmas so I quickly read the PMBOK and took the exam. Having the cert has not been useful in the kind of work I do, although it might have been in the past. I will try to attend meetings again in the future, but I'm not sure I'm going to bother getting enough PDUs to recertify, and I certainly wouldn't take that idiotic exam again. I think the process of PMP certification, while admirable, is deeply flawed. Anyway, hopefully my answers won't skew your efforts in the coming year; I don't think I'm representative of the membership in any way.	Nov 1, 2011 1:52 PM

54	Member support. The chapter serves the members, not the other way around. It's something all of PMI needs to remember.	Oct 6, 2011 10:30 PM
55	Offer each new member a free meeting invite to show the value of the sessions. I have not been to one, although I do intend to. It isn't that I can't afford to go, most of us in this profession make a decent living, but it's the money and the time. I have low expectations for events like this, and am loathe to lose an evening for minimal value, and it's insult to pay for it. If I were to attend one, and found it valuable, that ice-breaker might make it a higher priority for me. Right now, I don't know what I'm missing. I tend to find meetings like SIM and other monthly events like that (I'm not picking on SIM, they're right in the pack with most other professional organizations in my mind) to provide very minimal value outside basic networking. If PMISSC meetings are more valuable than what I expect from similar events, I need to be shown that. If I'm going to dedicate an evening and spend money doing it, I need to feel that the time and money were well spent, and that I really learned something or I'd be better off going to a ball game and decompressing a little. Additionally, set up some buddy system to help new members understand what's going on, what the value is in participating, and make them feel that they are wanted for more than dues.
